

Peer Support in learning/teaching Maths

5th Foundation Year Network Annual Conference ,
University of Sheffield,

14th and 15th July 2011

Vesna Perišić

V.Perisic@soton.ac.uk

School of Mathematics

Motivation for peer support

- November 2010: Facing the situation where, describe by a PGTA,
‘ it seems to be two levels of the students, either they are very good or very bad ’
- Question: What should I do?
- Answer: The students should help each other.

What I have done?

- Emailed the students with intention to encourage them to help each other – I was going to initiate a peer support group.

Students' reaction on my email

- I am quite interested in participating in the peer support, so I'd like to help.
- I would like to help out with this peer system, as I am comfortable with the topics, it sounds very useful.
- I would appreciate the support I could get.
- It is a good idea and one that will benefit all involved.
- As one of those students who are struggling I think it is a good idea. I love maths but I pick things up late. I feel I am always chasing the boat. I would really appreciate this.
- It is a good idea. It will be beneficial for both groups of students. Teaching is another method of learning. I am not sure I have enough skill/knowledge to teach somebody else, but I would love to help you as far as I can.

Meeting with the students interested in peer support

- I made a few introductory comments.
- Students took it over:
 - Communication – Facebook Group (Vesna's gangsters) was created
- My involvement has stopped here.

Feedback from the students at the end of the year

- I did benefit from the peer support. I felt that teaching topics to others helped to reinforce the topics in my head.
- I feel I did benefit because I gained friends from it. It may have contributed to 'The Base Room' being a study area rather than a wholly social one. I admired the patience of some of the helpers.
- Peer support has certainly had benefits for both those helping and getting help, and it is definitely a worthwhile endeavour. However, I think that those who made it work were probably the people who would have been getting together to study anyway. If you were able to find a way to extend it to a wider audience then I think it would be a great addition to the course.

- The group sessions were a great help but only for the socially confident, the less confident did not actually come to the sessions...maybe social interaction is more scary than facing hard questions.

Options here are to approach the strong and get them to reach out to the weak, Facebook is a powerful aid in these circumstances...

Questions arising

- Should I be doing this again?
 - Benefits?
 - Can peer support address some other issues such as:
 - diversity and its benefits
 - social interaction
 - team working skills
 - responsibility, solidarity,
- ???